SLOOP IN STORM

American Actress and Miss Jossie Milward Caught in a Gate While Fishing on Long Island Sound.

RESCUED BY TWO SAILORS

The Small Boat Was Beire Carried Toward Execution Light, When the Men Leaped into the Waves and Gaught a Rope.

ly escaped drowning while selling in the Sound Tuesday evening, when the that created havon in the waters about New York to-day, told to an Elvening World reporter who visited them at the Potter Marsion. Davenport Neck, Miss De Wolf's beautiful summer home, the story of their rescue.

Both young men were still suffering from the effects of their experience, but expected to be ready to take up the'c work of rehearsing for the coming sea-

"On Tuesday morning," began Miss De Wolf, "we decided to go fishing instead of going to the yacht races. We engaged a little fishing sloop manned by two sailors. These sailors are really college boys working through the summer to help them along. All we know of them is that they answer to the names of Dr. Howard and George. The are fine young fellows, and we reall; owe our lives to their heroism Fishing as Storm Come On. "We shiled out beyond Execution Light and fished all morning. At noon we anchored off Huckleberry Point and ate lunch. After luncheon we put up sail again and went back to our fishing. We were still fishing when it began to get black. I never saw anything like the way that storm came up and the peculiar shades the clouds threw on the

the way that storm came up and the peculiar shades the clouds threw on the water.

"Jessle and I were not frightened, and, as the fish were biting spiendidly, we thought we would keep at it until the storm passed. But it soon got so black we could not see a thing, and we told our salors that they better hoist sall and make for home. As they got the sail up a gust of wind struck us that almost capsized the boat. When we righted again we found that the steering gear had broken. The wind was blowing a perfect gale and we were midding at a terrifying speed toward the Execution Rocks, where great waves danced in the air.

"Our condition seemed hopeless and for the first time in my life I nerved mayself to face death. My courage absolutely forsook me, for though I knew I could swim I saw that there would be no hope against the terrible waves and mad, blowing wind.

"I was clinging to the side of the boat, which tossed about like a chip in a gale. I looked for Jessle and could see her standing up, clinging to the mast, lifer face was white as chalk, but she tild not say a word.

"Soon we were blown mast a tug and the same of the mon on the collection and and the collection and the collection and and the collection and the c

"Soon we were blown past a tug and one of the men on it called to us, 'For God's sake, keep off the rocks.' But our stearing gear did not work and we drifted on. As we ran in closer and closer I got down on my knees and began to pray. The thought uppermost in my mind was that I wanted to live, if only to accomplish something great on the singe.

mend was that I wanted to live, if only to accomplish something great on the singe.

"As we were tossed in toward the rocks I could see the lighthouse keeper and his wife standing on the shore signalling us to keep off. But we could not. Seeing our predicament he attempted to launch a boat, but in the great waves wrought up by the storm he could not. At last, just as we were about to dash to pieces-jon a great rock, we were caught in a current that worked us a little further out.

"Then the lighthouse keeper threw ius a rope, but it fell away short of the boat. Our two brave sailors jumped into the boiling water and swam and got the rope. Then they got us overboard and managed to drag us ashore, more dead than alive.

"Jessie tells me that the only thing size thought of was that if she ever got out alive she would never venture on the water again."

"Yes," responded Miss Milward, "no more water for me, if I ever have to go back to England I hope they will have balloons, for I am sure I can never oversome my dread for the water after that terrible experience."

KNOCKED GOVERNOR OFF THE PLATFORM.

Bystanders Just Prevented a Fight Between Arkansas Candidates.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Aug. 27.-The candidates for the Democratic Gubernatorial nomination addressed a crowd of 5.000 people at Bismarck.

Gov. Jeff Davis was the first speaker. and during his speech he wanted to know if his opponent, Associate Justice Carroll D. Wood, was a partner with John R. Dos Passos, of New York, in zinc mines in Marion County; how much mining stock he held, sold in Wall street, and whether Dos Passos did not have a $2,000,000 bond suit pending in the Supreme Court of Arkansas. In replying, Judge Wood entered a denial of the first question asked by the Governor, saying he was not interested Governor, saying he was not interested with Dos Passos, but the Governor appeared dissatisfied and interrupted the speaker before the latter could praceed further. Davis wanted to know when Judge Wood ceased to be interested with Dos Passos.

The Governor's manner and interruptions angered Judge Wood, and when he disputed the Judge's word he advanced on Davis and knocked him off the platform, which was about four iset from the ground.

The bystanders rushed in and prevented any further trouble, although the incident raused no little excitement. Davis was not hurt by the descent he made from the platform when Judge Wood knocked him off. So great was the commotion following the occurrence that the speaking was not resumed in the afternoon. A local officer who was present placed Judge Wood under arrest upon a charge of assault and battery.
